Report: Workshop with Rudy Simone on 12 November

Rudy's presentation was extremely informative and helpful. We had 62 in attendance and feedback has been good. The constructive tone and outcome of this workshop has encouraged us to consider organising further couple workshops in the future.

Thanks to everyone in attendance for making it a great event.

Book Recommendation

"Asperger Awareness A Key to Success for IT and Technical Managers"

By Stephen Plowright, available through Lulu

<http://www.lulu.com/product/15573007>

Stephen and his wife are part of our AS & NT support communities in Sydney, so this book is an exciting addition to our shelves and comes highly recommended.

Thoughts ...

There are two things that are essential for an Asperger marriage to survive, recover or grow.

First is that the person with Asperger's Syndrome be willing to explore and accept the existence of Asperger's Syndrome in their personality and their relationship, and hopefully seek professional guidance. People with AS tend to cope better and help their partners and families cope better when they are pro-active in understanding and managing their AS characteristics better. I know that many partners reading this carry a lot of grief around the hope of this happening for their relationship.

Second, the non-Asperger partner must stop believing that their partner will become neurotypical if they just learn about AS, "get it", accept it, get diagnosed or if we try hard enough to convince them. It is imperative for non-AS partners to continue to learn and thoroughly understand the facts about AS and how it is manifesting in their own relationship. Then we have to allow our minds to make a shift into accepting the AS, that it is here to stay and that change will be slow and limited, even with the most co-operative AS partner.

Some great words of advice from the 123 Magic & Emotion Coaching Parent Training Course are to "avoid too much talk, and too much emotion" when dealing with our children. This is important for any relationship, but particularly with Asperger's Syndrome because of the core difficulties in processing communication and emotions. A good motto: Avoid too much talk and too much emotion.

A word of caution, especially as the pressure of the Christmas season mounts - if the frustration levels in your relationship have reached the point where either you or your partner are frequently resorting to acts of bullying or abuse towards each other, eg, shaming, humiliating, belittling in public, put-downs, yelling, criticism, needling, swearing, threatening, breaking or throwing things, physical harm, controlling, over-riding, intimidating, depriving, etc, then it is time to stop, think and make a decision about a temporary or permanent separation. It is not ok to remain in & contribute to a relationship that is characterised by these behaviours, even if you hold Christian or traditional beliefs about marriage. Christian beliefs are primarily about love, kindness and self-control. Harming a partner with attitudes, words or deeds is not ok for anyone, regardless of beliefs and regardless of one's neurology. No relationship can be recovered within that kind of atmosphere anyway. "Time out" can work for adults too!

On behalf of ASPIA's Members and Committee, I would like to wish everyone a calm and safe Christmas and New Year season, filled with special moments of joy and hope. Carol Grigg.
