Thoughts ...

The following comments should really be submitted to a forum where they can be discussed. Our experiences are wide and varied, and my perspective on living with an AS partner is only one perspective among many valid experiences and perspectives. So please feel free to comment or contribute your observations via return email.

"Some time back I found myself telling one of our members that she had to stop expecting her partner to suddenly become "normal" because in effect she was bashing her head against a brick wall, and this would only cause more harm to herself, and also the relationship. I didn't mean this comment in any disrespectful way to either her or her partner. It's just a fact. Our partners have AS, and that's how it is. They will never be neurotypical, even though sometimes we may have the occasional "normal" interaction or situation that inspires hope that "normal" may be possible. This led me to recognise how we naturally ache to find solutions in the context of our relationships. It's a natural bent or instinct within us. It is uncomfortable and unnatural to stay in that state of "un-solution", with no code or tool or key to hand that will bring "normal" and solutions. Incredibly disempowering actually. It's like living in a constant state of unfinished business, combined with confusion, day in and day out, and is probably quite a significant threat to our mental and emotional health, and our future outlook. We just can't get our heads around the fact that our AS loved one will remain AS and can't gradually make a transition to NT, in spite of now having answers and information. We naturally seem to have this expectation and assumption every day that something will finally fall into place or "click" and then from then on our discussions and communication will become "typical" and we'll understand and interpret each other accurately. It is so hard to live in this state of accepting this will never be; that AS is here to stay in the relationship dynamic; accepting that there will be no solution that will bring a sense of "normality"; no magic wand; no code breaker. I am sorry for the bleak outlook today but thank God we can now benefit from the "normalising" process of meeting and identifying with other partners."

Carol.
