Thoughts ...

As I reflect on the many discussions I've had with other partners over time, I think one of the hardest things to have to convey, and hardest things for partners to take on board is that their partners are not necessarily deliberately behaving badly, neglectfully or irresponsibly, they have Asperger's Syndrome.

While AS does typically endow them with intellectual or creative giftedness in some way, there are many deficits that they simply have no capacity to recognise and therefore cannot change or do anything about. They don't know what they don't know. Pointing out their deficits only causes our AS partners to feel further under attack, and does nothing to alleviate conflict.

Stating these things is cold comfort I know when partners are desperately needing practical help or emotional support in the daily grind. The reality is that these needs for the most part cannot be met by the partner with Asperger's Syndrome.

The non-AS partner somehow needs to come to the point where he/she is realistically assessing what he/she can or cannot expect from his/her partner and then seek to live in that reality.

This is deeply sad, and we cry out at the seeming hopelessness of it, but until we can face and manage each day and each encounter realistically, we will continue to be harmed emotionally and burned out physically.

We keep trying to do the "marriage" thing while often our partners continue to do the "single" thing.

Perhaps we could take their cue and quietly, calmly and gradually gather the courage to begin to live once again like a "single" person would and regain a measure of independence and control over what we allow to affect us.

Just another thought ... (Carol)
